

I started out my sitemap with the header at the top. Obviously the landing page will be the first page a viewer sees, but it will also be able to be accessed by the home link, which will be the first link in the header. I decided to put it first so it is easy to be found when a viewer wants to get back to the landing page.

The link next to the home link will be an “about” link. The link will lead to a page that will describe me as a writer, editor, designer, or whoever I am. On that page, there will be different sections for each part I choose to use to describe myself.

After that link, there will be a link called “Projects” that will direct viewers to a page with different projects and things I’ve completed. I chose to include this link and page because I think if I were looking at a potential employee’s portfolio, I would be interested in seeing what things they’ve already completed and what they could be capable of. However, this will be more of a future link rather than including it this time, because I don’t have a portfolio to share yet.

Eventually, when I have a portfolio to share, the projects link will have my “Resume” link next to it. The “Resume” link will direct viewers to a page view of my resume. Along with being able to view it online, there will also be a download link.

Lastly, I have the “contact” link that will give my contact information, and there will also be an option for people to email me right from the page. I want to do this for easy contact. It would be a lot easier and quicker for someone to be able to shoot me an email directly from my page than to have to open his or her email.